Excerpt from Erromanga: The Martyr Isle

My share in this work is a small one. Many of his friends both here and in Canada had frequently asked Mr. Robertson to write a history of Erromanga, but the daily oversight of his numerous flock and other mission work on the island leave him little time for literary composition; and thus the project was again and again deferred. At last I offered, if he would write the narrative, to do all that might be needed in the way of making arrangements for publication. And so the manuscript was commenced, and the chapters, one by one as they were completed, passed into my hands. This book is now presented to the reader as a record of nearly thirty years' trial and perseverance in a small and remote portion of the field of missions.
