In the days of the buffalo, wolfing was a recognized industry. Small parties two or more men with team, saddle-horses, and camp outfit, used to go out into the buffalo range, establish a camp, and spend the winter there, killing buffalo and poisoning the carcasses with strychnine. The Jwolves that fed on these carcasses died about them, and their pelts were taken to camp, to be stretched and dried. O) The work was hard and not without its dan Si! gers. Storms were frequent, and often very severe, and the Indians were bitterly opposed to the operations of these wolf hunters, who killed great numbers of buffalo for wolf baits, as well as elk, antelope, deer, and other smaller animals. On the other hand, in winter the Indians did not usually travel about very much. The following pages describe the adventures of Mr. Peck and two companions all recently discharged soldiers during the winter of 18611862. Robert Morris Peck was bom in Washington, Mason County, Kentucky, October 30, 1839.
